MARKET COMMENTARY

Markets sent mixed signals in July. On one hand, inflation figures showed price rises slowing down. On the other hand, the fragile peace deal between the US and Iran fell apart, and tensions between the two countries flared up again, pushing oil prices back up towards $100 a barrel. Meanwhile, many companies reported strong profits, but investors weren't satisfied because expectations had been set so high, and they're becoming increasingly sceptical about whether all the money being poured into artificial intelligence (AI) will actually pay off.

Share markets around the world were mixed, as investors kept shifting money away from technology and fast-growing companies and into safer, more stable and cheaper ones. The NASDAQ, an index made up mostly of US technology companies, fell 6.6% in US dollar terms, though this monthly figure hides some big swings up and down along the way. A stronger Australian dollar also reduced returns for investors holding overseas assets that weren't protected against currency movements. Australian shares performed better, rising 2.3%, helped by inflation figures that came in lower than expected, which gave company valuations a boost. Shares in smaller companies fell sharply, and shares in developing countries also dropped as excitement about AI-related companies cooled off.

Returns on government and company bonds rose as tensions in the Middle East flared up again, after having eased through June. Oil prices jumped more than 23.0% over the month, briefly climbing above $100 a barrel. Even so, the softer inflation figures give central banks, like Australia's Reserve Bank, more room to move, and markets now expect fewer interest rate rises than they did earlier in the year. The extra return investors demand for lending to riskier borrowers also increased, particularly for the riskiest companies, reflecting the higher uncertainty.

The Australian dollar rose 1.4% against the US dollar in July, taking its gain for the year so far to 5.2%. The US dollar weakened against most other currencies as fears of an imminent interest rate rise eased. The Japanese yen fell sharply, prompting Japanese authorities to step in and help stabilise its value.
